Semifinalists chosen for UM presidency

By HEIDI BENDER
Montana Kaimin Reporter

The number of candidates for the University of Montana presidency has been pared down to seven semifinalists.

The presidential search committee, which released the names of the semifinalists yesterday, will interview each candidate at UM before submitting at least three recommendations to the Board of Regents late next month.

Final determination of President Richard Bowers' successor will be made by the regents. Bowers' term expires June 30.

The seven presidential candidates are:

- Richard Bowen, former president of the University of South Dakota and former South Dakota commissioner of higher education. He has a doctorate in political science from Harvard University and a bachelor's degree in history. He has been a foreign service officer with the U.S. State Department and has held staff positions in the U.S. Senate. Bowen also has been an associate professor of government at USD, and is currently Distinguished Professor of Political Science there.

- Neil Bucklew, provost of Ohio University in Athens, Ohio, has held administrative positions at Central Michigan University.

He has taught labor economics, public-sector employment relations and personnel and industrial relations. He has been personnel director at Duke University Medical Center and director of employment relations at the University of Wisconsin at Madison.

- Lawson Crowe, former chancellor of the University of Colorado at Boulder. He has been a philosophy professor and associate dean, acting dean and dean of the graduate school there. He also was provost and vice president for research and is a Fellow for the University of Colorado Institute for Behavioral Genetics. Crowe has a doctorate in religion from Columbia University.

- Garry Hays, chancellor, Minnesota State University System. Hays, who is chief executive and operating officer for a seven-university system, was previously director of academic planning and curriculum development and vice chancellor for academic affairs. He has a doctorate in history. Hays chaired the board of directors of the Minnesota Humanities Commission. 'Also a member of the Commission on Women in Higher Education, Hays has written and spoken widely for the advancement of women in administrative positions.

- Edward McGuire, vice president of corporate planning

Summer pay raise axed by committee

By CATHY KRADOLFER
Montana Kaimin Legislative Reporter

HELENA—Raises for summer school faculty were axed yesterday by a legislative committee.

The recommendation to pay summer school faculty for two rather than three months work is one of two proposed cuts in the area of university salaries that is being considered as Republicans and Democrats attempt to hammer out a spending plan for the next two years.

The other cut was a possible $1.6 million decrease in staff and faculty salaries as part of the pay plan for state employees.

The conference committee on the state's budget for the next two years voted 5-1 to retain the current practice of paying summer school faculty based on the number of weeks they teach rather than the number of hours.

Sen. Pat Regan, D-Billings, argued that although the summer quarter is eight weeks long, faculty teach the same number of hours and do the same amount of work as those who teach during a regular 10-week quarter.

"Why should a faculty member stay and take that kind of cut in salary just to have a summer job?" Regan argued.

But Sen. Gary Aklestad, R-Shelby, argued that Montana would be out of line with the practices of other states if the salaries were raised.

The raise in summer salary was recommended by the Legislature's Finance Committee, which spent two years studying how Montana universities compare to other western schools in funding for higher education.

Shortly after the conference committee reached its decision, a "summit conference" of legislative leaders suggested funding the state pay plan in a manner that could cut up to $1.6 million from the university budget.

The Republican leaders proposed spending $48 million to give state employees 12 percent pay raises for each year of the biennium. To do so, they would assume that state agencies will have a 3.5 percent "vacancy savings" rate. Vacancy savings occurs when employees retire, resign or quit, resulting in a "savings" during the time their salaries are not paid.

The problem for the university system is that because it must offer a certain number of courses, it cannot afford to allow a position to remain vacant for long. Its vacancy savings rate is about 1.5 percent.

The Republican plan, then, would short the university about $2.6 million. The governor's office has said it would favor adding a contingency fund for the univer-

CB doles out more bucks

By SUSAN TOFT

Central Board voted last night to award four special allocations, and decided to charge an ASUM administrative expense to the special allocations fund.

At last week's CB meeting, the board voted to change the formerly volunteer student bargaining position and the student bargaining assistant to salaried positions. The salaries are $100 per month for the student bargaining position and $50 per month for the assistant. It was assumed by members of CB that the salaries would come out of the ASUM administrative budget.

But, viewing the ASUM administrative budget deficit, reportedly near $15,000, Business Manager Carl Burgdorfer suggested that the expense be covered by a special allocations request.

According to Burgdorfer, the ASUM administration has only about $900 left in its budget to cover expenses from now until June 30, the end of the 1980-81 fiscal year.

CB approved the following special allocations requests:

- Symphonic Band — $122
- Pre-med Club — $100
- Physical Therapy Club — $100
- Vietnam Veterans of Missoula — $665

Combating air pollution: all must help

Regulatory actions by local governments such as controls on the use of wood stoves must not be the only method used to combat Missoula air pollution problems, the Missoula City-County Air Pollution Control Board was told last night.

"A demand for a voluntary constraint upon our activities out of respect for others" must also be a goal of any anti-pollution formulas, Richard Gotshalk of the Missoula Citizen's Advisory Committee on Air Pollution said in the presentation.

Concrete proposals and a philosophic rationale for action formed the basis of the report to the government air control board. About 120 people listened in the city council chambers as chairmen of the four citizen committees outlined their study results.

The committee recommendations are only advisory, but because the city-county board established the citizen's committees, findings are expected to influence future air-pollution control policy.

The committees identified three types of pollutants in Missoula's air: Particulates, mutagens (cancer-causing agents) and carbon monoxide. Wood burning is a major source for all three pollutants, although motor-vehicle engines emit the most carbon monoxide.

The committee said all three pollutants are known to be harmful to humans. Although infants and the elderly are most susceptible to the health hazards, the report said everyone is affected.

Gotshalk told the board solutions must be found to the pollution because of the following detrimental effects:

- health of Missoula valley residents.
- economic costs of receiving medical aid for the health effects.
- additional economic costs as pollution problems dampen economic growth.
- hidden costs as valuable members of the community move somewhere else to escape the pollution.

Included in the proposals are rules that would restrict the installation of inefficient wood burning in new residences. Fines for people who inefficiently operate wood stoves and produce too much dirty smoke, and strict amendments to the county air pollution regulations, are also outlined.

The recommendations for controlling transportation pollution, such as dust and carbon monoxide, are not specific. The committee said that paving gravel roads and improved street cleaning practices will help, but people must be convinced to drive less. They cited education programs and improved bike paths as ways to combat motor-vehicle-caused pollution.

A public hearing will be held in the city council chambers on April 29.

Montana Eagle needs money to soar

Have you ever seen an eagle fly? It is swift in flight, keen-eyed and wise.

The Montana Eagle — a new state-wide weekly newspaper — is keen-eyed and wise, but it needs your help to be swift in flight.

The third issue came out yesterday, but you may not see it for days: the Montana Eagle has no subscribers yet, so it doesn't qualify for swift, cheap second-class postage rates.

The Eagle is looking for people willing to pledge support by agreeing to subscribe for five years at $20 per year — a real bargain. As soon as 2,500 people pledge their support, the fourth issue will be published.

James Lubek, editor and publisher of the paper, will be in Missoula on Monday. Lubek's excellent first editorial tells why he is publishing a weekly in Montana: he can see more than one possible future for the state, and wants us to see the possibilities too.

Lubek remembers reading with astonishment that wolves and eagles once populated his native Indiana. He points out the similarities between Indiana when eagles soared above it and Montana right now, and implies the danger of Missoula becoming Gary, Ind. if we don't all watch eagle-eyed:

"Sometimes I wonder if my descendants will be struck with the same awe as I when they read Montana histories a hundred years from now — histories which speak of an abundance of wolves. And eagles."

While Lubek demonstrates his environmental ethic, his reporters write clear, fair, objective articles on issues of interest to us all.

The Montana Week in Review sections contain terse, tight and telegraphic pieces on such things as the probable lack of oil for the Northern Tier Pipeline, gold mining in the Crazy Mountains, a flap in the controversial Environmental Quality Council (a misnamed group liked better by industry than environmentalists) and a state move to open up the corporate workings of ARCO to public view. None of these stories appeared in Montana's dailies.

The first issue also contained the fairest, most complete analysis of the Environmental Quality Council ever published; a fine story about Wolf Point; an analysis of fraud in the cattle industry and an article on the forty languages spoken in Montana. (How many can you name?)

There was more, all presented in readable format on 32 handsome pages.

The second issue continued the investigative trend with articles on health care planning and the lack of it, behind-the-scenes Montana political mover Herb Williams, the causes of the wind erosion that is destroying Montana's farmland, and a solid piece on the demise of Anaconda. "Stoneboat," a brand-new short story by University of Montana English Professor William Kittredge, also appeared in this issue.

The first issue generally has been well-received, Lubek said, and the second is just getting out to pledges and distribution points. In Missoula, the paper seems to disappear as soon as it arrives, so if you want to see a copy you should call its office in Helena at 443-5420.

The new weekly's staff includes a former legislator, several experienced Montana journalists, a fine photographer and some sharp organizers who run the office. A paper that starts with such a fine crew is destined to go far.

But destiny requires human agents, in this case subscribers. Lubek emphasizes that subscribers shouldn't send money until the paper publishes its fourth issue: the fourth issue means that enough people have promised to subscribe. Lubek said he hopes it will be out in a few weeks. "We're very excited about the Eagle's success; I'm quite optimistic about this going on under our plan."

If Montana has 2,500 smart citizens, Lubek's optimism will be justified and the Eagle will soar—sharp-eyed, wise and swift.

Margrave: Space exploration essential to human survival

By DOUG O'HARA
Montana Kaimin Reporter

The successful flight of the space shuttle Sunday through Tuesday could "galvanize" American opinion into supporting the exploration of space, according to Thomas Margrave, University of Montana associate professor of astronomy.

Margrave said that for the past 10 years or so, the United States has had a "critical paralysis" of its will.

"I think space is a great opportunity for . . . transcending ourselves and doing great deeds," Margrave said, adding that the exploration of space is "essential to the survival of humans."

One immediate benefit of the space shuttle will be the launching of the space telescope in late 1985, Margrave said. With a 96-inch lens, the telescope would be the "largest and best-equipped" telescope ever to orbit the earth.

Margrave said this telescope will be "a watershed for astronomy," and will allow more accurate measurements of galaxies and possibly give information on whether nearby stars have planets.

While the space shuttle was a big success, and could "revolutionize space exploration," the program "is also eating up the lion's share of NASA's budget."

Because of the enormous costs of the space shuttle program

(about $10 billion), several projects were postponed or dropped altogether. Margrave said the launching of a gamma-ray observatory was postponed until 1998, and a proposal to launch a satellite to orbit the sun on a polar orbit was canceled. Also, he said the budget of physics and astronomy research was cut by 8 percent.

"The shuttle is just a truck to take things to and from orbit," Margrave said. "If you don't spend money on cargo, then it's useless to scientists."

Margrave said the commitment to develop "cargo" for the space shuttle to haul just hasn't been as big as the commitment to develop the space shuttle itself.

For example, Margrave said, no money has been spent to develop a permanent U.S. space lab. "A permanent presence in space is mandatory for this country to maintain continuous research." Many research projects can take months or years for completion.

Margrave said a permanent space station is important from a defense point of view. "It's encouraging to know you're on high ground."

Would he help explore space? "I'd leave tomorrow and never come back, if I had the chance," Margrave said, then added: "I'd take my family, of course."

Edna Mae (Ellen Burstyn), retrieved from a brush with death in the automobile accident that kills her husband, finds herself suddenly with the power to heal the deaf and lame with her touch. Offering her gift to those who want in "in the name of love," she is a faith healer without an orthodox faith and this gains her the enmity of fundamentalists who want her to acknowledge the Holy Ghost as the source of her healing powers. Playwright Sam Shepard, here in another excellent film performance (he was the "dying" young farmer in Days of Heaven), is the local roughneck who is at first liberated by Edna's power and then consumed by it. Roberts Blossom, who played the crotchety old father in Citizens Band, plays Edna's stern, moralistic pa, and Eva Le Gallienne got a Best Supporting Actress nomination for her portrait of Grandma Pearl, a weathered Kansas farm woman. Burstyn's virtuoso performance — as a strong, sensual, simple woman who is as surprised and troubled by her gift as her neighbors are — is the best reason to see this movie and earned her an Academy Award nomination as Best Actress. 1980. ## Prince resists bikinied groupie

SYDNEY, Australia (AP)—Prince Charles, who is spoken for anyway, managed to resist the charms of a young woman in a bikini bottom and T-shirt yesterday as he took a morning dip in the Pacific Ocean.

The prince, on a royal tour of Australia, was in the water at Bondi Beach at about 7 a.m. Photographers followed and the prince's guards were trying to keep them at a distance, when the woman, believed to be a professional model, headed for the prince.

His private police officer, John

McLean, fended her off twice.

Officials said the stunt was "not very original." A photographer from a London paper denied it was a "Fleet Street setup."

"She was probably just looking for a good time," he said.

State workers' strike temporarily avoided

A state employee's strike that could have brought out the Montana National Guard was narrowly averted yesterday as legislative leaders spent a hectic day negotiating a financial package. A ranking state official said the walkout, due to have begun at 6 a.m. today, could have involved 2,000 workers and "shut down the institutions." Gov. Ted Schwinden said he was prepared to call out the National Guard to maintain basic services in that event. Labor spokesman Jim McGarvey, representing about a dozen state employee unions, said the strike was postponed indefinitely. "The decision was based on assurances of both parties that the negotiated settlements would be honored," McGarvey said. "We plan to monitor very closely the summit meetings."

Fuel waste causes cricket mutations

Newborn crickets with extra heads, eyes and antennae emerged from eggs that were exposed to a substance found in synthetic fuels, a government research scientist says. Barbara Walton, an environmental toxicologist, reported that impurity in the chemical acridine caused the defects. Acridine is found in many synthetic fuel processes, often in the waste matter. The chemical used in the tests was commercially produced and did not come from coal liquefaction or gasification projects, Walton said. However, she said, she has performed other unpublished tests showing that coal-derived liquids have the same mutagenic effects on the crickets.

Physical therapy department on probationary accreditation

By DOUG O'HARRA
Montana Kaimin Reporter

As far as Richard Gajdosik is concerned, it's time for a celebration.

Gajdosik, director of the University of Montana physical therapy program, is rejoicing over the program's recent accreditation — without which this year's graduating class could not take licensing exams.

This year's 15-member graduating class is the program's first, and the accreditation makes the program the only accredited one within about 500 miles, Gajdosik said. Until now the nearest programs have been in Salt Lake City, Seattle and Grand Forks, N.D.

The program received "probationary accreditation" on March 11 from the American Physical Therapy Association.

There are several reasons for probationary status, Gajdosik said. Mainly, the program needs more money — for another faculty member, travel money for selecting the summer interns and more equipment and supplies, such as cadavers, for dissection.

A cadaver alone costs at least $200, Gajdosik said, and the program doesn't have the most modern electronic muscle stimulation devices.

Gajdosik said it is difficult to say how much more funding is needed to remove the probationary status, but added that the addition of another faculty member is very important.

The UM administration has supported the program from the beginning, Gajdosik said, as well as getting "tremendous support" from Philip Catalfomo, dean of the pharmacy school. The physical therapy program is part of the pharmacy school.

While probationary accreditation normally does not last more than two years, Gajdosik said he is optimistic that the program will receive the necessary funding. In the meantime, he emphasized, the program is considered fully accredited and is listed along with about 90 other accredited physical therapy programs in the country.

The "primary thrust" that achieved the accreditation, Gajdosik said, came from the faculty and the 30 students.

Professor Vince Wilson, who is retiring this spring, has taught physical therapy at UM for 38 years. Gajdosik said it was Wilson's "life goal" to have an accredited program at UM. Even in his last year, Wilson has developed two new courses, Gajdosik said.

Also, Associate Professor Janet Hulme, who joined the faculty in the fall of 1979, has developed a new course each quarter. "In order to get this program started," Gajdosik said, "the faculty needed to absorb a lot of stress."

Gajdosik came to UM in the fall of 1976 after spending a year in Dillon as a physical therapist. He received his bachelor's degree in physical therapy in 1971 from the University of Kentucky and received a master's degree in 1974 from the University of Cincinnati.

The students in UM's program have been outstanding, Gajdosik said. "I can't speak highly enough," he added.

The competition to get into the two-year program is intense, Gajdosik said. There are only 15 positions available in each class. Forty-five applied for the first class, which was chosen in the fall of 1979, and 75 applied for the second class chosen last fall. He said seven members of each class already have college degrees, and the average age is about 25.

The faculty doesn't "spoon feed" the students, Gajdosik said. "They are expected to come into the program and want to learn."

By using exercise programs and various equipment, Gajdosik said that physical therapists help people achieve the maximum body movement within their individual limits. Physical therapists work not only with rehabilitating people from accidents and strokes, but also with children and people with sports injuries, he said.

While there is a trend for physical therapists to specialize, Gajdosik said the program at UM concentrates on giving the students a broad background in physical therapy, which prepares them to operate in a rural environment like Montana.

The program also has a physical therapy clinic that takes referrals from the UM Student Health Service, and is open Monday through Thursday for two hours in the afternoon. But starting October, Gajdosik said, students can bypass the health service and come directly to the clinic, for evaluation, because of a recent change in the Montana Physical Therapy Practice Act.

Perhaps the main training that physical therapists receive is "instilling optimism" in patients, Gajdosik said. Patience, tolerance and persistence are stressed: "There's no such word as 'can't' to a physical therapist."

Editors to argue coverage

Journalists will turn debaters today when Rod Deckert, managing editor of the Missoulian and G. George Ostrom, editor of the Kalispell Weekly News, discuss the Kalispell paper's coverage last fall of a convicted child molester.

The two papers disputed the validity of the coverage, which Missoulian reporter Steve Smith called "an act of astonishing cruelty" in articles last September and October.

The discussion, set for 3 p.m. in the Journalism Library, is open to the public. The Society of Professional Journalists is sponsoring the debate.

Montana Kaimin Reporter

Attorneys for the Crow Tribe will appeal the recent U.S. Supreme Court ruling giving ownership and control of the Bighorn River to the state of Montana.

The 6-3 decision, rendered March 24, overturned the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals ruling last year that said the Crows owned the riverbed and bank of the river, and could regulate hunting and fishing on it.

Tom "Bearhead" Swaney, tribal councilman of the Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes, said the decision involves not only water but energy.

Swaney said yesterday the court decision was a "hidden attack by the multinational corporations to get Indian resources." Much of the nation's coal, uranium and other resources lie under Indian lands. Swaney said the court took a "strict constructionist" stand on the treaty and "for the first time has read a treaty to the letter."

He explained that until this ruling, courts for 100 years had taken the view that the treaties must be interpreted as perceived by the Indians who signed them — not according to the specific language in the treaty. Crows thought at the time the river, which bisects their eastern Montana reservation, was theirs, although this was not specifically stated in the Crow Tribe's 1851 and 1869 treaties.

It is not known now what effect the ruling will have on water adjudication rights. The Bighorn is being eyed by several Wyoming companies as a source of water for a coal-slurry pipeline, now in the planning stage.

Although tribal leaders on the Flathead Reservation fear that the Bighorn decision will prompt court tests of water-related issues on their reservation, Tom Meredith of the Billings Area Bureau of Indian Affairs Solicitor's Office, didn't think the effect would be contagious.

"If the court stuck to the specific issues at hand (on the Crow Reservation) then this ruling shouldn't apply to other reservations," Meredith said, in a statement released Monday. "However, if the court based its decisions on broader issues, yes, its decision could open up questions on the Flathead and elsewhere."

During the past few years, the Bighorn River has been the scene of conflicts between non-Indian sportsmen and tribal game wardens. Before the Crows decided to ban hunting and fishing on the river, thousands of Billings-area residents flocked to what many fishermen call the "best trout stream in the lower 48 states."

The Montana Fish and Game Commission then closed the river to non-Indians to prevent further confrontations. Despite the ruling, the commission has kept the river closed until its April meeting, when it will determine its policy.

Al Bishop, a lame-duck member of the Fish and Game Commission, said last week the river should be opened immediately to fishing.

Bishop, who led the fight to get the river declared state property, said: "It got past the fishing stage a long time ago. We're talking about a principle now. It was the cowboys vs. the Indians and the cowboys finally won — that's the attitude here."

The Catholic clergy on the reservation said it will support a protest by members of the tribe that includes a plan to boycott businesses in Hardin and Billings, a 12-mile march from the Crow Agency to Hardin today and a day of prayer and fasting tomorrow along the Bighorn and other places on the reservation.

In a statement issued Tuesday, the Catholic priests and nuns on the reservation called the court decision "a blatant violation of Crow treaty rights" and a "threat to rights guaranteed by all Indian treaties negotiated with the U.S. government."

Yesterday, five spokesmen for the Crows traveled to Washington to gain support for their appeal of the decision.

In a news conference on the U.S. Supreme Court steps, Tribal Secretary Ted Hogan, in traditional Indian dress, said the decision would be economically devastating to the tribe, not only because of lost revenue from hunting and fishing licenses, but also because of the plans it has for mineral development, irrigation and hydro-generating potential.

ANOTHER WAY WE MAKE IT EASY

FOR VETERANS

TO AFFORD COLLEGE

Would $9,000 go a long way to help finance your college education? As a veteran, you may qualify for Army ROTC's newly enacted Simultaneous Membership Program (SMP). That's $5,000 to $9,000 that could be yours depending on your current academic year.

Here's how it works. Become a member of an Army Reserve or National Guard unit as an officer trainee. At the same time, enroll in the Army ROTC Advance Course on campus.

Your Reserve or Guard membership will pay you at the minimal level of E-5 while you also receive $100 per month as an Army ROTC cadet.

Be commissioned a Second Lieutenant at the conclusion of your second year of ROTC, and serve with your Guard or Reserve unit while you complete the remainder of your college degree requirements.

After graduation, continue to serve part-time with the Guard or Reserves while pursuing your chosen civilian career on a full-time basis, or compete for active duty as an Army Officer.

And you can take advantage of this new program while continuing to be fully eligible for your regular GI Bill or Educational Assistance benefits.

For more details,
come talk to us.

He is former chancellor of the Board of Higher Education in Massachusetts and commissioner of higher education and assistant secretary of education for Pennsylvania. Holding a doctorate in education and a degree in law, he has been a consultant to colleges and universities, private industry and government agencies.

• Robert Rutford, interim chancellor at the University of Nebraska. Rutford has a doctorate in geology from the University of Minnesota. As director of the Division of Polar Programs in 1975, he supervised all U.S. activities in Antarctica. In his participation in international science activities, he has done on-site research in Antarctica.

Weather or Not

Fat Joe scrutinized the wizened crust under his heat lamp. "Jesus, Daggy, I sell jillions of pastrami and Swiss every day. How can I remember one?"

Dag sighed. "Yeah. But it was slow that day, wasn't it?"

"How can you be sure it was that day?"

Dag raised an affronted eyebrow. "I beg your pardon," he said pointedly.

"Daggy," said Fat Joe, grabbing a hunk of stomach, "look at this here blubber. You think I got this way on a diet? I know more about food than anyone, and I say you can't tell what day that crust was bought."

"I've eaten in more than 15 countries!" retorted Dag. "I know more than you!"

"You do not!"

"Do so!"

"Do not!"

The pedantic polemic was interrupted by Dorsey jangling Joe's entrance bells. "Chute," he said, taking off his water-spotted fedora, "increasing cloudiness, high of 65, low of 38 and maybe some brief showers. So what's with the crust?"

Dag told him about the dead-end clue and Joe's skimpy memory.

"Yeah, I figured that might be the case," Dorsey rocked on his heels, hands in pockets, eyes roving Joe's face. A trickle of sweat creased Joe's triple chin. "Joe. Ya mind if I step in back and grab that thuringer I ordered?"

"Sure, Dorse, go ahead."

Dag and Joe watched while Dorsey clicked back to the storeroom. A moment later, Dorsey appeared in the door jamb with Fat Joe's inventory clipboard in hand. He solemnly shook his head.

"You're lyin', Joe."

• Michael Riccards, dean of arts and sciences at the University of Massachusetts at Boston. Riccards was previously political science professor at the State University of New York at Buffalo, where he also was the chairman of the political science department. His doctoral degree carries an emphasis on political behavior and American political thought.

Margery Brown, associate dean of the UM law school and chairwoman of the search committee, said there were originally 152 applicants for the presidency.

committee consist of two student members from the Library and Archives Committee, one acquisition librarian from the library and one divisional librarian from one of the departmental libraries on campus, instead of two students and two acquisition librarians.

Also, the library fee will now expire five years from implementation, to be renewed only on approval of CB and the Board of Regents.

Petitions containing signatures of students in favor of the fee were in a backpack stolen

The committee narrowed down the list of applicants to 26 on March 28, and selected the seven semifinalists Saturday. Committee members used the last four days to notify the candidates of their decision, Brown said.

Each semifinalist has been contacted and has accepted invitations to visit the UM campus for interviews on the following days: Bowen, next Friday and Saturday; Hays, April 26 and 27; Crowe, May 8 and 9; Riccards, May 11 and 12; Bucklew, May 15 and 16; Rutford, May 17 and 18; and McGuire, May 22 and 23.

yesterday from the Lodge Food Service. Jim Brennan, member of the Library and Archives Committee, said that the petitions were in an olive green colored backpack "with the bottom falling out."

Brennan said that he doesn't know what will be done if the petitions are not recovered.

CB also decided to send a memo to student groups funded by ASUM, encouraging them to write a description of the activities for which their ASUM money will be used. Board members said they need the information in order to properly budget student funds.

sity of $1 million to make up some of the difference.

But, according to university officials, the contingency is not enough.

President Richard Bowers said that while faculty and staff would not have to be cut under the Republican proposal, "our hopes of repairing the damage done with cuts made in the past four years would be in serious trouble."

Senate President Jean Turnage said he does not want to cause the state universities and colleges any hardship but added, "it's time the universities start living in the real world."

In an apparent reference to the university system's 38 percent increase, Turnage compared the system to George Orwell's Animal Farm saying, "all the animals are equal except the pigs are better than the others."

Rev. Sun Myung Moon —the inspiration of CARP

The concept of the messianic kingdom has been discussed since the time of ancient Israel. Rev. Sun Myung Moon's idea of the Kingdom of Heaven, however, has attracted much attention of late.

Rev. Moon's detractors claim he is trying to establish a worldwide totalitarian theocracy. However, his followers say they want only to see the voluntary manifestation of God's will on earth through acts of service and love by individuals, families, societies, nations and the international community. They point out that God can work quite well within the existing democratic system, as long as the people seek His will and practice it.

Perhaps those who fear the determination of Rev. Moon and his followers to establish God's kingdom on earth would be relieved to know that in reality this determination originates not only with Rev. Moon but with Jesus and God themselves; and in any case the kingdom is to be built through acts of service, love and free will—never through force or violence.
